But the point which he misses throughout is that all these things have a tendency towards freedom, towards light. Before we can have culture these reforms must be made. It is impossible to be nothing but idealizers. Tour ideas must have a practical issue or be of no advantage. The Liberals work at these reforms, therefore, for the distinct object of culture. What is legislation but machinery? Was it ever meant to be anything else? Are we to legislate ideas? Is not Free Trade to be advocated, Parliament to be reformed, Churchrates to be abolished? Mr. Arnold spends his life in pointing out inj ustices; the political parties do away with them. We cannot assert that in such reformers sweetness and light are always shown in the strongest manner. But we are to consider the end proposed; the man is a...
