Excerpt: . . . develop and maintain a complete listing of all configuration items and a baseline configuration for NFE, including application software, data files, software development tools, hardware, and documentation; ensure that all significant system changes, such as parameter changes, go through a change control process; apply comprehensive patches to system software in a timely manner. For example, a FDIC report stated that in the third quarter of fiscal year 2006, software patches for 15 out of 21 high-risk vulnerabilities and 5 out of 34 medium-risk vulnerabilities were not implemented within required time frames. In another report, between July 9, 2006, and October 9, 2006, out of nine high-risk patches that were not implemented within the required time period, eight were not implemented for 42 days. review status accounting reports, or perform complete functional and physical configuration audits; and update or control documents to reflect the current state of the environment and to ensure consistency with related documents. Specifically, documents such as the NFE security plan, risk assessment, and contingency plan did not reflect the current environment. The NFE project team did not institute the above because it did not always consistently follow the processes as outlined in the NFE configuration management plan. According to FDIC officials, they were not following the plan because it has not been updated to reflect the new system development life cycle. In addition, according to an FDIC official, patches were not implemented in the specified time frames because contractors do not always follow FDIC policy. As a result, the corporation has a higher risk that NFE may not perform as intended. Although FDIC had taken steps to...
